Scenarios

Scenario 1: Adding a TV show to the "want to watch" list

Ben Ellis just watched an ad for a TV show he has never seen and would like to watch it in the near future. He would like to add the show to his "want to watch" list.

He logs onto TVrater and is taken to his personalized home page. On this page he has a few options of what to click. He clicks on the "want to watch" list. This shows him what TV shows he has yet to see but is interested in. There is also an option to add a TV show. He adds the TV show he has just completed to the list by searching through the database and finding the TV show and clicking on it. It is now in his "want to watch" list.

Scenario 2: Adding friends

Ainsley Noble met someone who also has a TVrater account. She would like to add that person as a friend and look at their activity.

Ainsley logs onto TVrater and is taken to her personalized home page. On the top right corner is a "settings" button that she clicks on. Here she can make her account public or private. She makes her account public so she can become "friends" with others. She then goes to the search bar to find her friend's public account using their username. She clicks on their account and presses the "friend" button. Her friend must then accept the friend request so that they both can comment and interact with each other's reviews and lists.

Scenario 3: Rate and review a show

Alexis Davenport has finished watching season one of a show. She would like to rate and review the season.

Alexis logs onto TVrater and is taken to her personalized home page. She types the TV show name into the search bar at the top of the screen and clicks on the show when it comes up. From there she is taken to a page where she can pick a season. She clicks on season one and then is given the option of rating the show from 1-5 stars and as well as entering a review, both of which can be edited at anytime.
